Caught in an angry social media storm, a number of marketers have ended promotions linked to the NRA, but it's unclear whether boycotts have a lasting impact.

Major airlines join growing NRA boycott

Companies follow other corporations that cut ties with gun rights group

By Lindsey Bever, Fred Barbash and Avi Selk
WASHINGTON POST

Delta and United — two of the largest airlines in the world — have joined a growing list of companies cutting ties with the National Rifle Association amid a growing boycott movement inspired by the Feb. 14 massacre at Marjory Stoneman Douglas High School with a legally purchased AR-15 rifle.

Without context, the airlines' twin announcements on Saturday morning might look trivial: The end of flight discounts to the NRA's annual convention, which few outside the gun rights organization likely knew existed before they became boycott targets.

But in abandoning the NRA, the airlines followed car rental giants Avis, Hertz and Enterprise, the Best Western hotel chain, the global insurance company MetLife and more than a dozen other corporations that have severed affiliations with the gun group in the last two days.

While it's unclear what effect the corporate snubs will have on the NRA, they have given the nascent #BoycottNRA a string of rapid, prominent victories and exposed vulnerabilities in a gun rights lobby that had seemed untouchable less than two weeks ago.

The NRA claims 5 million members and takes in tens of millions of dollars each year through supporters, which it uses to fight gun regulations in the name of the U.S. Constitution.

Ongoing outrage

The group has faced public anger before — after the massacre of schoolchildren at Sandy Hook Elementary in 2012, for example. But it has always fought back against pushes for gun-law reforms, and efforts to significantly restrict firearms inevitably die out as public fury over the shootings ebbs.

But outrage over the Parkland shooting — sustained in part by politically active teenagers who survived the massacre — has shown no signs of dying out. Police say a former student killed 17 people with a legally purchased semi-automatic rifle, one of at least 10 guns he owned.

As calls for gun control have spread, the NRA has increasingly become a target of activists, with social media hashtags urging boycotts of any corporation found to be linked with it.

Delta and United are the latest to submit to the pressure.

Facing questions from the liberal outlet ThinkProgress about its discounts for NRA members flying to the group's convention in May, a Delta spokesman at first defended the program as "routine." The airline "has more than 2,000 such contracts in place," the spokesman said, according to ThinkProgress.

Come daybreak, Delta abruptly discontinued the discounts and asked the NRA to take the airline's name off its website. United Airlines followed suit the same morning.

Like other companies that ditched the NRA, the airlines faced an immediate backlash from some gun rights supporters.

Some other companies have, so far, not been moved by the boycott calls. FedEx, for example, still gives NRA Business Alliance members up to a 26 percent discount on shipping expenses. Google, Amazon, Apple, AT&T and Roku all stream an NRA-produced video channel despite pressure from gun control groups.

Defiance from leaders

The NRA has not commented on the boycott movement as a whole. But on Saturday afternoon it tweeted a video addressed to "those saying #DumpNRATV," where spokeswoman Dana Loesch attacks the media and claims the rifle association defends free speech.

"I find it interesting that those individuals who simultaneously preach about free speech want to silence the speech of the millions of people who make up NRA membership," she says.

This follows a week where NRA leaders spoke defiantly at public appearances, blaming the fury on media manipulation.

"Many in legacy media love mass shootings," Loesch said Thursday at a conservative political conference. "Crying white mothers are ratings gold."

"They want to make us all less free," NRA chief executive Wayne LaPierre said when he took the microphone. The correct response to the Florida shooting, he said, was more armed security on school campus — not fewer guns in the United States.

After the Parkland shooting, a prominent city council member in Dallas said the city no longer wants the NRA to hold its convention there in May, Fox News reported. But officials in Kansas and Nebraska have invited the gun group's business.

Florida Gov. Rick Scott and other Republicans have already endorsed banning assault rifle sales to anyone under age 21 — which the NRA opposes. Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., on the other hand, at a CNN town hall this week said he would continue to accept political contributions from the gun rights group.

According to Business Insider, the NRA is funded largely by the gun industry, which have contributed tens of millions of dollars and helped the gun lobby build alliances and power networks across the U.S. political system.

The same industry, of course, also makes many of the hundreds of millions of guns believed to be in the country.
